I've always enjoyed storytelling. For some people, the written word may be what immediately comes to mind when deciding how to tell a story. However, Visual Storytelling is perhaps just as important, if not, more so than the written word.

I love using my art to tell a story or to convey themes and ideas. For example: "Valley of Death" contains multiple references to death, despair and doom. These references specifically being the crows, the black hole sun with dark skies, the dead tree, and the field of death Lilies that lie in the background and invade the foreground.

As both a future writer and current visual artist, I confidently believe that visually seeing a story unfold before our eyes helps connect us to media in ways that the written word simply cannot. I look forward to the days where I will finally sit down to write my own comic book series and use my own art to bring my ideas to life.
